As the first day of junior high arrived we felt excitement mixed with fear.

Because of the frightening tales we heard from last year's class, we approached Mr.

Daniel's class with fear and trembling. I noticed all my friends were fearfully slinking into the room too. I glanced quickly at this man who put the fear into us before we even knew him. He was not tall, but built with rippling muscles bulging under his school approved light blue, button-down shirt with the required red tie. His black frizzy hair with strands of silver was combed over a newly formed bald spot. Piercing blue eyes under bushy black brows stared us down until we cringed in fear. He held a wreck of a meter stick taped with duct tape in several places. We could taste our fear as we wondered what the use of such a battered stick might be. The bell rang, so we all slid into the closest seats we could find. Suddenly there was a loud crack as Mr. Daniel walloped my front-row desk with the meter stick. "Stand up!" He roared. "Who told you to sit down?" A class of frightened, naïve seventh graders lined the wall as Mr.

Daniel called our names to fill the rows. I risked a quick glimpse of his scary face. Was there a slight twinkle in that icy blue eye? Was he pulling on his mustache to hide a twitch of a smirk? Was this going to be a year of daily fear—or surprising fun?
